“Large language models for rapid asset creation are taking centre stage – as are AI tools for predicting audience reactions,” says Mark Read, WPP CEO.

As more brands unlock the potential of AI, he adds that having a clear creative vision that enables them to connect with consumers humanly and uniquely will be more crucial than ever.

There will be a growing emphasis on safety and security as AI scales.

“Bias interruption in the use of AI will be top of mind as we automate more. We’ll use smart new technologies to mitigate disinformation.

“And zero-party data will continue to be a critical part of a privacy-first marketing ecosystem while building greater trust and connection with customers,” says Read.

Other emerging trends are driving results in innovative ways. Sound increasingly underpins brand identity.

“Gen Z streamed 500bn songs and 3bn podcast episodes in the first half of the year, marking a 76% increase from 2022. We expect music and entertainment to become a bigger part of the marketing mix in 2024,” says Read.

WPP puts money where its mouth is with acquisition of influencer marketing agency, Goat

Estimated to be worth $22.2bn by 2025, influencer marketing is coming of age. “With the rise of iCommerce, influencers are selling directly to consumers through social platforms, like TikTok Shop. Understanding the intersection between influencers and SEO, and getting that SEO right, will be a game-changer,” he says.

Brands are also forming partnerships that defy category conventions, becoming increasingly immersed in esports and co-creating with artists to entertain new audiences.
